Improvements in systemic therapies for metastatic renal cell carcinoma have been modest at best in the last decade. A combination of platinum compounds, immunotherapy, and cytokine therapy has enhanced the response rate in metastatic renal cell carcinoma, but this has led to increased toxicities. Newer systemic therapies have been less successful. Better understanding of the molecular pathogenesis of renal cell carcinoma is leading to a better understanding of the molecular basis of tumor heterogeneity. This knowledge may eventually lead to new therapeutic approaches in the treatment of this disease.
