Not much call for a video surveillance administration program to get crazy. The software is clear and easy to use. In fact, it's harder to use than most. There is a manual, but there's no simple illustration of any of the software's wiles. If you like details, you'll revel in the picture, but if you're like me, you'll just wait to download it to your laptop and have a quick-and-dirty look. It cost $19, which is fair-price for the specs. The video quality is crisp, but not ludicrously so. A 600-MHz Pentium II processor, 512 of RAM, and a hard drive of 1 GB should be more than sufficient for typical uses, so I did not see any need to even attempt to swap out a hard drive. If you don't have a hard drive, you can send the trial version to the local DreamSphere, as they get to evaluate its utility. For the price, there are a few things that could be done with Luxriot that are worth considering. First, if you want to go to the trouble of putting up video, there are advantages to using the web console to adjust settings, or even going to the MapMind setup (available for anything licensed that comes from MotionPoint or Arris) to adjust the same settings. Even with the former, any changes that you make in the browser go to all of the cameras on the server. You can make the videos play automatically, or have it go off the web server to a local PC or Mac. There are also differences in the time of day that software can see - the software is still going to work at least for two days, but there are times during the night where it will become extremely confused as to what is happening. It isn't really sensitive to whether there is activity or not - it simply kicks in at sunrise and resumes when it comes back down. It is blocked out by the MapMind computer-tracking software, which includes a night vision mode. The software is intuitive enough ba244e880a
