You can test by accessing the unpacked folder. If it worked, I doubt it'd be necessary to spend any further time. If the game doesn't appear when you play the unpacked files, start "setup.exe" as an Administrator. That may be necessary because the game may no longer have administrator rights. If the game starts fine and that doesn't help, see if you have "Medieval II: Total War" already installed. If it is, right-click the game icon and uninstall it. This will remove both the installation files and any pre-loaded patches and expansions, but anything you might have already installed before will remain. Use of the unpacked files will not affect the Steam version, only the CD version. The Steam version will be updated automatically. Steam adds individual saves to save games. These do not appear at the end of an unpacked game, since I don't want to require the user to re-download the unpacked files. When Steam is closed and re-opened, it will find the unpacked files, automatically "manage" their files and put in a copy of itself. No further user input is required.
