You must be logged in to post this storyQ: Cocoa: How to show an animated NSView Is it possible to make an NSView that is inside another NSView, so that if I make the latter NSView small enough, it will be possible to see the first one with all its details? Like in Messages.app - you can see the individual bubble frames of each message... A: Yes, you can but, of course, it's a more tricky implementation because you have to do the drawing for every single frame which is just a job for the GPU rather than the CPU which is much simpler. Fortunately, there are Mac OS X screensavers that demonstrate this effect and even make it easy to take a screenshot of the effect (i.e. you can take a screen shot of a screen that is full of messages and this will show you all of them as individual messages). Here is an example of a screenshot of my contacts list that is quite a bit messier than what you describe. (As of macOS High Sierra, it contains over 2000 contact records.) You can also see examples of this in this article: (It's from August 2018 so has to be updated to use the new macOS APIs.) You can also control which of your contacts appear by selecting them in the contacts list and pressing "Select All." This will select them all and grey out the "select" line in the list, then you can deselect all the contacts that you don't want to see by pressing it again. If you want to add your own contacts, you can do that easily by dragging contacts from the Contacts.app into your contacts. However, I don't think that you will be able to get what you want exactly by just animating the width of the "contacts" view (as you describe in your question). This 3da54e8ca3
