Remote

Remote Desktop Control is a software package that allows you to manage multiple computers from a single location. You can log in and out from any of these remote computers at any time, having remote desktops appear at the same time. You can control the remote computers as if they were your own, by manipulating applications windows, screensavers, printer drivers, sound, and mouse settings.

Remote Desktop Control is primarily designed to be a convenience tool that enables you to control multiple computers from a single location. Most of the features are logically implemented. They may not appear to be particularly useful, but some of the software's capabilities may be useful to you or to your organization if the configuration is configured and administered appropriately. Security is also a concern. Both the setting security and account security should be provided in order to prevent unauthorized users from viewing or modifying or gaining access to remote computers' settings. Remote Desktop Control also provides a command line utility and provides remote access to a PC via LAN or Internet connections. It is possible to view the log files to get an idea of whether or not one of your remote computers is being remotely managed. Additional Features: Remote desktop connection is made by connection to a specific remote computer by IP address. For connection by LAN, add the IP of the remote PC to a list. Multiple computers can be controlled from a single location. Remote remote computers can be controlled simultaneously. It is possible to log in as different users for each remote computer. Remote computers can be set to power on automatically as soon as a connection is established. The logging feature allows you to view a log file that shows which connection was established when, and which remote computers had connections established for that user. Direct connection mode allows you to access remote computers directly, without requiring the remote computer to respond to a request for connection. It is possible to enter a password during connection in this mode, although it is recommended that remote computers be configured with their default passwords. You may also be able to configure the command line, LAN and IP-range selection in order to specify which remote computers you wish to access. Remote computers may be configured to send you an email notification when a connection is established. Control by email can be selected as the method for notifying you when a connection is established. An email account is required in order to configure this. Access to remote computers may also be configured to have mouse or keyboard input in the same way

---
