Saturday, April 17, 2010 The Cleveland Barons' All-Star Game Experiences: The First Round On a Thursday afternoon last spring, a few thousand fans and a couple of hundred reporters filed into a suburb of Cleveland for the first round of the 2010 Triple-A All-Star Game. Earlier, Major League Baseball commissioner Bud Selig had welcomed the "whole region of Cleveland" to the game. At the time, there were little more than a dozen fans in the stands at Gund Arena, which hosts the NBA's Cavaliers. Before the game, Selig introduced State Senator Lou Petito Jr. to the crowd. Petito, a Democrat from the city of Cleveland, was escorted to the mound. "I could have named three of the players who are up here tonight," Petito told the crowd. The game began on a mild and sunny afternoon, as Major League players jogged onto the field before throwing out the ceremonial first pitch. In the dugouts, a handful of big leaguers chatted with their minor league brethren. The Triple-A teams were separated by league affiliation: the Eastern Division had the International League's Buffalo Bisons and Richmond Braves, and the Western Division had the California League's Lancaster JetHawks and Fresno Grizzlies. The Eastern All-Stars came out for warmups in their uniforms, while the Western All-Stars began game play in jerseys resembling those of their American League counterparts. The home team, the JetHawks, played in white uniforms with the dominant, late-'90s "Hawk" logo. I didn't want to give that up. Benny Looper, the head athletic trainer for the JetHawks, was a Buffalo native who played baseball at the University of Buffalo. After graduation, he was hired as the team's head athletic trainer, and he's been with them ever since. One of his former players, Ryan Church, is also a JetHawks batboy, and sat in the Bisons dug 3da54e8ca3
