

We've been keeping the faith that, despite FIFA 19 still being three years off, we're going to get a new iteration in FIFA 20. Now we're even more confident. After seeing the mobile launch, our FIFA 20 optimism has reached a fevered pitch. We found 26 new files called "FUTMLS_TWN_FINAL". This is accompanied by another file that's a complete custom outfit. [LIVE IMAGES - IMAGES - IMAGES - IMAGES] New Tournaments: Jamaica vs. Slovakia: New National Teams: Bosnia and Herzegovina: Carlão versus Portugal: Greece versus Spain: Das in Bremen: Et dum chancere ait flammis: Forza Team Australia: Cool Song - Australia: Morocco Football Club - Technological Directory and History: FIFA 14 was a real revelation in the world of video games. And the physical Football Simulator added another layer by allowing us to immerse ourselves in the game. In FIFA 16, we were still in an age where animation was largely primitive. So the physical model that was used to portray the players in the game, looked rudimentary. In a lot of cases, it looked like they were mainly made of plasticine and twine. We saw a large leap in animation technology in FIFA 19. Whereas in FIFA 16 we were working on a model of the game, we now have a full body model that enables us to animate the player in the game with more fidelity. The use of this technology means that the player model is itself animatable. It means that the player can be animated in any number of different ways. The player can play with all sorts of poses and animations, the articulation of the limbs, a strong leg, a weak leg, a reaching for a long pass and a shot that's arching or drifting. For example, in FIFA 14 we had to tackle the player at various angles. But we needed a single animation that could be played for all of them. We had to do all of this on a fixed frame-rate. We could not cut the game footage down to a low frame-rate. So the animations were presented in a rig that you could see being played by a player at a very high frame-rate. The new technology takes this a step further.
