Various electronic and electrical devices exist which can detect electrical characteristics of samples (e.g., solutions, biologic samples, semiconductor wafers, microelectronic components, and the like). Such devices are commonly referred to as bio- or chem-electrochemical sensors, or analytical devices. Analytical devices may be used in areas such as food safety, bioterrorism, environmental monitoring, chemical analysis, clinical lab testing, and the like. Such devices are expected to operate reliably in hostile environments and over a wide range of temperatures, including very high or very low temperatures. Some traditional electrochemical sensors are designed to be disposable. In these types of sensors, the electrodes are usually disposed within a housing which also contains the reagents for the electrochemical sensing reaction. The electrodes may be placed within a housing filled with the sensing reagents, or the electrodes may be placed within a cavity in which the sensing reagents are deposited and the reaction is induced by a voltage applied to the electrodes. In either case, a hermetically sealed, disposable package can be used to house the electrodes and sensing reagents. These types of electrochemical sensors have been used in a variety of applications. For example, such devices have been used for detecting microorganisms in food, detecting toxins in water supplies, detecting pathogens in environmental waters, and the like. To assure that the sensors provide accurate results, it is important that the
